New song lays out the stakes in the 2024 presidential election and serves as rallying cry to get out the vote

A coalition of concerned musicians release catchy rock anthem Last Call to Vote (Together We're Stronger) as a clarion call for Americans to unite in preserving the fragile experiment of representative democracy while we still can.

Oakland, California - Beet the System, a Bay Area band known for its hip-shaking grooves peppered with words that matter, announce the release of their new single to kick off the 2024 election season. Co-created and recorded with a community of familiar faces on the Bay Area music scene including Deborah Levoy, Russell Ives, and Zoë Sindhu Moré, Last Call to Vote (Together We're Stronger) is a stern but uplifting reminder that the Biden/Harris ticket is the only choice on the ballot this November for voters who care about democracy.

“Our hope is that this song can serve as a kick in the pants to folks who may be considering a vote for someone other than President Biden or sitting out the election altogether,” says Sven Eberlein, writer and producer of Last Call to Vote. “Our message to these fellow citizens is that we understand democracy is messy and we don’t always align on every issue with a candidate. However, we have arrived at a crucial junction in this nation’s history where only one choice is left on the ballot that will enable us to continue to hash out our disagreements peacefully and through the electoral process.”

Together We're Stronger is as much a motivational anthem for campaigns and organizations mobilizing to get out the vote as it is an affirmation of active hope for those disillusioned by politics. “It’s important for us to remind people who might feel powerless in the current political climate that they are not alone,” says Baba Johnny White, mandolinist, songwriter, and singer with Beet the System. “So what we want to convey with the singalong chorus is that the antidote to feeling disconnected is to unify around our collective civic power.”
